SELF-MOTIVATION

"Remote employees need to be proactive and take initiative to get things done without being constantly reminded, monitored, or pinged for progress updates, says Wang. "In an office setting, your manager may sit next to you and can monitor you or help you throughout the day," she says. "In a remote setting, you need the person to be able to do things on his or her own with a lot more independence."

Remote workers need to be self-starters, says Hall. "Employers want to know, does this person require a lot of direction? Does this person keep their deadlines? Can this person set goals and achieve them?" she says. "Employers often structure interviews with behavior-based questions that post hypothetical situations, asking how the employee would approach a project."

Be sure your answer demonstrates your motivation by including the methods and systems you use to get the job done. "You can say, 'This is what I would do in this situation,'" says Hall. "Share how you would structure a task and prioritize important work. Show the employer how you get things done."
